States have accepted Russian regulation of the Jews without question. Those holding this opinion ask why the United States cannot recognize Russian right to pass upon Jews desiring to enter Russia from this country as the nations adjoining Russia have siready done. It is also pointed out that Russia doesn't bar Jews because of their religion, but because she maintains the right to exclude all whom she chasses as "undestrables." On this ground Russia maintains her speatite of excluding missionaries representing any of the Protestant faiths, and Catholic priests, except those desiring merely to travel. Those intending to spread the propagands of their faith are absolutely barried from entrance into Russia or residence there.

Russian officials are teady to cite in this connection the exclusion of Chinese, of Javanese, of polyamists and persons considered understable by reason of infinite to the criminal records, pupperism, or diseases, by the United States. This government, they will point out, has never yielded one jot of its right to admit to the United States whom it pleases, and barall persons not wanted.

The utterances of public officials of the American sovernment in this phase of the intention have not escaped notice, and are in the bands of Russian afficials, to be used in answer to American demands. They have picked upon a paragraph of a seeech by Secretary of State Knox, in which he spoke of the right of a nation to regulate immigration, as follows:

Our relations with Russia will, of course, continue friendly and harmonious, and a new treasty up to date will soon be written. Russia cannot afford to sulk and be isolated.

Mr. Sulzer further cited the resolution adopted by Congress when the treasty with France was abrogated in 178. That resolution charged France with violating the treaty.
